

Focus Groups

for PNI's Online Services

Overview

As part of its research, the Online Development Team in April and May met with four “communities of interest” to discuss information issues: what they’re missing, what they want and how an online service may help.

The four groups -- people who like to travel, parents of young children, small-business owners and high-school teachers -- were selected after consulting with Ellen Jacobs, who guided the team throughout the process. We decided against creating focus groups out of demographics such as “computer owners” or “users of online services,” which are based more on the medium than content.

This strategy allowed the team to learn about the specific information needs of each group, and it pointed up some themes common across the groups. Also, the focus group members were varied in computer expertise: some used online services regularly, and others were thinking of joining one. Some said that they didn’t own a computer and that they didn’t plan to buy one.

We talked with the groups about how they get information (for planning a trip or a family outing, for example) and the frustrations they have in getting this information. What we found out can be used to help PNI shape its online services.

Themes within focus groups

Travelers

The strong themes with this focus group were getting the most for your dollar, and getting good information.

Do-it-yourself bargain hunting

A number of the group members expressed a distrust of travel agents, saying they’re more interested in making a commission than getting their clients the best rates. Dalvin Palmer, a former trucker, said he’s always been able to get better deals by calling hotels’ and airlines’ “800” numbers.

Larry Allen, a computer consultant, countered that if you have a travel agent you’ve been working with for years, he or she knows your travel preferences, such as wanting an aisle seat on an airplane.

Roadtrips: Pick up and go

Not only did a number of the group members not want a travel agent to plan their trips, they sometimes didn’t bother to plan them themselves. Hitting the road without an itinerary was common.

For example, Steve Ronquist, the son of another focus-group member, said he'd hop on the bus without a specific travel plan. Palmer said when it comes to driving trips, he just likes to pick up and go.

And Patrick Wilmot, who helps the blind learn how to travel, said that when it comes to in-state and regional destinations (such as Las Vegas), he and his family will travel on the spur of the moment.

Finding reality

Finding what a destination is "really" like -- things such as whether a hotel is "really" good, and what the "real" local culture is like -- is a goal of many in the travel group. They want to eat where the locals eat, not where the tourists eat, and they want to see how people live, not a version of local life packaged for tourists.

Many in the group are frustrated at not being able to find this "real" information. But one, Larry Allen, said he found a way to get it: by using an online service. On a Prodigy message board, Allen posted a note asking about a hotel in Puerto Rico. Another Prodigy user, who happened to live about a mile from the hotel, told Allen that it was indeed a nice place.

Parents of young children

This group, while rather computer-literate, uses traditional sources, such as magazines and books, for information about parenting and children.

Planning for family

For ideas on day-to-day events and larger family outings, members of this focus group turned to traditional sources: event listings published by municipalities, coupon books, magazines, the newspapers and word of mouth.

One participant, Mark James, said he used the Republic's Weekend section to help plan family events, but was frustrated that calendar listings can't be found in the paper daily. If you don't keep your Friday paper, you've lost your plans, he said.

Getting parenting information

Again, the parents turn to traditional sources for information on parenting issues such as health and education. Books, magazines, information provided by the child's school and friends were listed as sources.

Although their sources are scattered across media, the group members apparently feel they are getting the information they need to be a good parent.

Computers and kids

A majority of the participants said their kids used computers, whether at home or school. Most of their children had strong interest in computers.

Some of the group members expressed concern about the violence in Nintendo-type video games, and felt that there should be more non-violent games available for kids.

As for online services, a few of the group participants have used them to help with parenting, and have allowed their children to use them. There was a concern over the cost -- that the "meter is always running."

Small-business owners

This group was perhaps the most familiar with computers; each member said he or she used one at work. All but one of these computers was equipped with a modem.

Information about regulations

The most heated topic was keeping up with state and federal regulations. Many of the group members were very frustrated, saying they try to follow the rules, but the governments make changes without telling them.

They added that they're often given conflicting information from the same agency -- one person will tell you one thing, another within the same agency will tell you something completely different.

Don't waste my time

Compounding the frustration with regulations is the inability to find such information quickly. Their businesses demand long hours as it is; they don't want to waste time wandering around looking for information.

Hank Bried, who owns a plumbing business, says it's nearly impossible to keep up with regulations. He added that it's difficult to follow the legislative process that creates these rules -- and still have time to run a business. It's gotten to the point, Bried said, that he basically ignores some regulations.

Prospects of online services

The group members were intrigued by the idea of finding regulations and related news (such as pending legislation) online -- as long as it could be done efficiently, without wasting time.

They also liked the idea of setting up a small-business electronic forum, where, using message boards, they could exchange ideas or even pursue business leads with other small-business owners.

Some members of the group said that they know that the Internet contains information they could use, but that they wouldn't know where to find it.

High-school teachers

This group also has a lot of experience with computers, however, they're not always trained to use them. And although their students may have access to computers in the classroom, the kids' families may not be able to afford one for the home.

Need to know how

A common problem across districts, the teachers say, is that although the computers may be provided to the school, there's hardly any training for teachers. Often, the students know more about the computers than the teachers.

Sometimes, a school's computers go unused because no one knows what to do with them, or there isn't enough time to learn how to use them.

Student use

Computer use by students varies from school to school. A student's standing also affects his or her computer time; those with behavior problems, for example, may not be allowed to use computers at all.

Students of focus-group member Malcolm Scott use computers constantly in the classroom. Scott, who teaches learning-disabled and mildly retarded students, even requires that homework be done on computers.

Although computers are common in the classroom, the focus group members reported that use of commercial online services is not. Schools do use special educational networks, however.

Brent Hershley, who teaches students with discipline problems, thinks students would use online services if they knew it would help their grades.

Teacher use

Although all the teachers in the group said they had computers at school or at home, not all used them extensively. Some use their machines only for keeping grades and word processing.

Nancy Miller, who teaches below-average readers, uses America Online to check out information in the National Education Association area, as well as send e-mail and read news stories.

The focus group members indicated that their contact with other teachers is limited to their own district. They liked the prospect of having an electronic forum with teachers across the state to exchange thoughts or tips on computers and other education topics.

Themes across focus groups

In addition to the themes specific to the “communities of interest,” general themes arose in all the focus groups.

“I want to do this, but I want it explained to me first.”

Almost everyone was interested in using computers and online services, but many said they need to be taught how to use them effectively.

“I don’t want to pay a lot.”

The cost of an online service put off a number of people. Not being able to use a service effectively compounds this problem -- the meter’s always running while you’re trying to figure things out.

“I want to quickly find what I’m looking for.”

Many participants, especially those in the small-business group, would subscribe to an online service only if it was easy to use. They don’t have the time to waste on “learning” an online service; they want to find information quickly and efficiently.

“I want ‘real’ information.”

Participants want good information that is “untainted” by bureaucracy or ad promotions. This was best expressed by members of the travel group, who, for example, wanted to know what a hotel was really like (not how the hotel described itself in promotional material.)

The inside story

What Phoenix Newspapers Inc.'s publications offer can be summed up in two simple words: A lot.

From A (stock listings) to Zing!, our readers have access to news, sports, entertainment, computers, calendars, business and anything that fits under those umbrellas. And from The Arizona Republic, The Phoenix Gazette, Community and the Arizona Business Gazette comes access to other valuable reader services: PressLine, faxes and special sections.

Information sources

We get the information we publish from sources as easy to process as the wire services to those as time-consuming as snail mail and faxes. The wires give us instant access to information: We use what we need (or have space for), edit it and put it in the paper. Updates are as simple as peeling off the latest writethrough; finding the information involves knowing what to look for and when. What eats time and opens more room for the potential of error is the flood of material we receive in the mail and the hard-to-read reproduction of faxes. Hundreds of staff hours are spent each week sorting through this material, making calls to answer questions, typing it into the system, editing it and then sometimes spiking it due to a lack of space.

How much time is involved? Checking with sources and inputting the information for obituaries takes eight hours a day (we get up to 80 obits a day). The Republic receives between 200 and 400 letters to the editor each week and only about 5 percent come via e-mail. The rest come in envelopes (75-85 percent) and fax (10-20 percent), meaning they need to be input. Some stringers and freelancers are filing by modem or sending us material on disk, but we still get a lot of their material by fax or mail, which mean someone in-house must input the material.

Reporters and editors get snail mail, faxes and phone calls every day. And while more newsroom staffers are getting access to online services for e-mail and information, the number is still far from being a majority of employees.

A question of rights

Publication and reuse rights are givens with staff-produced copy and photos, but there are gray areas we've avoided regarding rights with wires, syndicates, stringers and free-lancers to this point. Do we have the right to use wire stories and columns published in the paper in an online product? Do we have the right to run wire stories that don't run in the paper in anything we set up online? As we decide what from the wire we'd like to offer readers, we'll need to answer these questions. Do we have full rights to copy produced for us by stringers and free-lancers? This area is becoming more clear as we get signed agreements from these writers allowing us to move their copy for reuse on the New York Times wire.

Setting PNI apart

When it comes to news and features, we have the corner on Arizona. Local news, sports and entertainment will be there for viewing to anyone with access to our online provider. Valley and state residents will look at us one way, snow-birds and potential tourists will look at us another.

A look at the database content sort shows areas that can be unique to the product we create online.

- > Both papers offer computers sections with locally written copy and staff-produced photos and graphics. We offer stories with local angles, advice columns, glossaries, online tips, new product information and calendars.
- > Calendars produced by both papers offer up-to-date information about everything from business seminars to art galleries to concerts. Done right, we could be the source for what's happening in the Valley and the state.
- > Alt. is our print link to future readers and could be our tie to technoteens. This section is written by teenagers for teenagers and could be as hip as we want it to be. Right now, there are stories, reviews, college tips, job tips and a chance to sound off. Online, we could make it the place for teens to share information about everything from what they thought of last night's concert to why they can't stand school.
- > Community gets us into neighborhoods with stories about local government, local problems and local people. We could take it to the next level by letting neighbors talk to neighbors online, opening links to city officials and segmenting the news by community for easy access.
- > Housing is hot right now as people move into and out of the Valley. Through Az Home and some features and business offerings, we could keep people up to date with new developments, mortgage rates, builders and advice.
- > Arizona travel and outdoors stories show the state for what it is - a great place to be year-round and a draw for people ranging from skiers to desert rats, from campers to those looking for five-star resorts with golf courses and spas.

So what can we offer readers here and around the nation? A lot. And more.

The database

What we offer our readers is detailed in the attached pages, which have been broken down by content; and day-by-day by paper and section. For the database content sorts, sections were homogenized - for example, the A sections were called Main; The Republic's Valley & State and The Gazette's Metro sections were called Local; the various feature sections printed by both papers were called Features; the departments within the ABG (Small Business, High Technology, etc.) were broken out separately; and Community was listed as a section, which runs in R and G.

PressLine

PNI already offers its readers an alternative. And judging by the numbers, people are willing to look for PNI information outside the newspapers.

With PressLine, news, sports, business, entertainment and a wealth of other information is only a phone call away. And, like with online services, people must work their way through a menu of options to get what they want.

How willing are people to get information without turning a page? In 1994, there were more than 1.5 million calls for horoscopes; more than 1.4 million calls for stock quotes; 623,000 calls for soap opera updates; 65,000 calls to hear the weather; 17,000 calls for restaurant reviews; and, to show you that people will do anything, more than 30,000 calls to hear the Jingle Cats meow Christmas music. And that's just a short list of what PressLine had to offer.

PressLine uses The Associated Press, Voice News Network, resources of The Republic and The Gazette, and feeds from sources such as KUPD (music information) and Channel 10 (weather). By dialing some of the numbers - stock information, news numbers - callers get information that is only minutes old, something we could do online by updating stories as they unfold, not just on our regular publishing cycles.

PressLine also offers The Talking Directory, an advertising service that lets callers hear an ad then choose between such options as direct connection to the business or receiving coupons, menus or other information by fax.

Wire services

The Phoenix Gazette and Arizona Republic rely on several wire services for their state, national and international stories, and for syndicated material such as opinion and advice columns.

Of the thousands of stories we receive each day, the papers use only a fraction. That is not to say that everything we get is worth running. Few readers care about who got a promotion in Oklahoma City or a Muslim uprising in a small Philippines village.

What they might care about, though, are Simpson trial sidebars and any related stories or at-a-glance items that spin off big news events, something we don't have the space for in the dailies but would, given the rights, be able to include online - The Simpson Files; or Plane Crash, The Full Story. And we could update - with photos - as often as the wires move the stories.

The Gazette and the Republic both subscribe to the following wire services: The Associated Press, New York Times, Los Angeles Times/Washington Post, Knight-Ridder and Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones News.

The Republic also uses Scripps Howard, Copley, Bloomberg Business News and States News Service.

The Gazette also uses Wall Street Journal and Dow Jones News Service articles.

Papers available on Knight-Ridder are: Aberdeen (S.D.) Faxes

Faxes? We got faxes.

Check any fax machine in the newsrooms and you're likely to find them spitting out information or see a pile of faxes in the trays, waiting to be distributed.

These machines have become a great way for us to get information - press releases, stringer copy, documents, story tips, letters to the editor, etc. - quickly, but they also have their drawbacks. The biggest is that they're instant junk mail providers. And no matter what useful material we get via fax, we have to put it into our computers by hand if we want to use it in stories or other products.

But faxes give PNI the ability to provide information to readers and customers. The Republic, Gazette, Community editions and the Arizona Business Gazette offer informational faxes. Penetration percentages, however, fight against us. While figures show that about 99 percent of businesses nationwide have fax machines, only about 6 percent of homes do. That number will grow as more personal computers come with fax/modems as standard equipment, but just because they're in the machine doesn't mean people will hook them to a phone line.

A lot of the faxes offered through the newsrooms are free and getting them is as easy as calling the PressLine number, entering a code and then punching in a telephone number. Free faxes have included sports calendars; election results; Q&A's; computer users groups calendar listings; college financial aid sources; transcripts; and cooking tips. Another free fax is the Traveler's Gazette, a product made available six days a week to Valley hotels for their customers. Traveler's Gazette contains, events tips, TV best bets, places to eat, news briefs, airport weather conditions and other information.

Some faxes offered by PNI come for a fee. They have included the annual Christmas lights list and map; ethnic food markets; summer activities for kids; wildflowers lists and maps; and travel destinations. Customers pay for these faxes by inputting their credit card numbers. Despite the fee, there is a demand for these faxes: At $2.95 each, 841 Christmas lights maps were sold.

Just the fax

Advantages

- > Quick access to information for newsrooms
- > Newsrooms and PNI can offer extra information to readers for free and for a fee.

Disadvantages

- > Instant junk mail providers.
- > Material faxed to us must be put into computer if we want to use it for publication.
- > Number of homes with fax capabilities is low.
